Le monde francophone

The French geographer Onésime Reclus first coined the word francophonie in 1880 to designate geographical entities where French was spoken. Today, la francophonie refers to the collective body of over one hundred million people all over the world who speak French, exclusively or in part, in their daily lives. The term francophonie refers to the diverse official organizations, governments, and countries that promote the use of French in economic, political, diplomatic, and cultural exchanges. Politically, French remains the second most important language in the world. In some Francophone nations, French is the official language (France), or the co-official language (Cameroon); in others, it is spoken by a minority who share a common cultural heritage (Andorra). The French language is present in Europe, Africa, the Americas, and Oceania.
